My mother worked in a factory.

She often left for work before my parents woke up. When all of us siblings were young, she had to go to work early and stay late, leaving us with our grandmother. As we grew older, things changed.

Mother earned a living by working at the factory. She had to start early and finish late. We kids had to take care of ourselves.

One day, my mother was out of work. She was very sad and cried. She told us that she was tired of working so hard for such little pay. She said she wanted to do something different, something that would make her happy.

I decided to talk to my father about it. He said we could try to find another job together. We started looking for ways to improve our situation.

We found a new job and my mother was able to start working again. It wasn't easy, but we worked hard and eventually got a raise.

Now, my mother is happy and we all feel better about our future.

When the war ended, we came home to the mountains.

We had to adjust to life after the war. The routines and structures we knew were gone. We had to find new ways to live and work. The mountains provided a sense of peace and a connection to nature.

We built new homes and started new businesses. The mountains were our refuge and our source of sustenance. We learned to adapt and survive in this new world.

Our children grew up in the mountains and learned to love and respect them. We passed on our knowledge of the land and the wildlife to the next generation. The mountains will always be a part of our identity.
